

The Editor's List - Designed to help you review your word choice

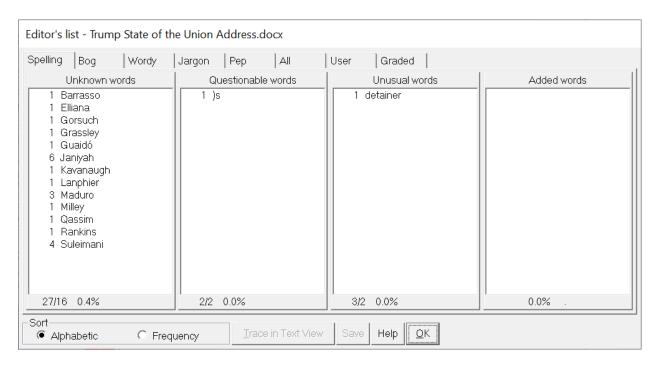

We've created a tool for writers and editors to review documents in our StyleWriter 4 software and would like comments from writers and editors on how we can improve it. The Editor's List classifies every word in your document under eight lists.

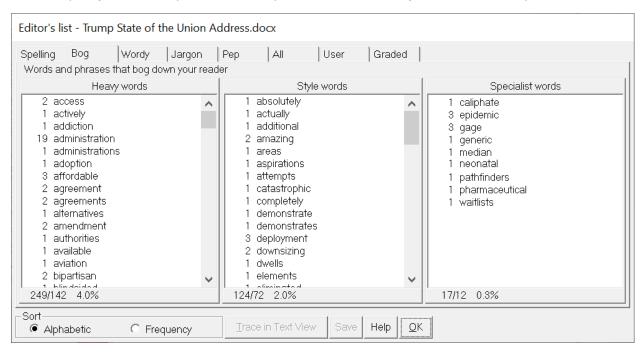

The graphic shows Trump's State of the Union Address analyzed by word difficulty from Easy to Difficult. You can sort the lists alphabetically or by frequency (useful for finding overused words). You can also highlight words and use Trace in Text to find them in the document.

The lists include:

Spelling – all unknown words in StyleWriter's dictionary (a quick way to spellcheck long documents) and questionable words that fool conventional spelling checkers. Two other columns show unusual words and words you have added to the dictionary.

Bog – words that slow your reader down, including heavy words (avoid if you want to improve readability), style words (StyleWriter offers you alternatives) and specialist words for you to review.

Wordy – shows you passive verbs, hidden verbs and wordy phrases you can edit to save words. Editing with StyleWriter usually cuts the word count by up to 25 percent without loss of content or meaning.

Jargon – Shows you your acronyms, difficult words, and jargon phrases in your writing. A quick way to see if your writing contains jargon you can edit.

Pep – Words that add interest and style in your writing. Interest words consist of vivid verbs and specific nouns. Names list proper nouns used. Conversational words and phrases are a sign that you're writing in a conversational style. A great list for professional writers such as journalists and authors.

All – Shows every word in the document. Glue words are the most common 200 words excluding personal pronouns (used by StyleWriter to find wordy sentences). The short list is every word in the document excluding the glue words – useful to see overused words in the document. Odds and ends show anything else you've written, such as numbers, email address and websites – a great way to see inconsistencies in how you write web addresses.

User – With StyleWriter you can add your own editorial checks to the program's House Style category. If you want to check that USA is U.S.A., you can tell the program that's your house style. It will highlight USA wherever it finds it in the text and offer you the correct form. It's as simple as using Find and Replace in Microsoft Word, but with StyleWriter you can add hundreds of these checks and search every document for your own house-style rules. You can also add your own category of issues. I have added Negative Words, which listed for me to review. The Editor's List shows Trump's speech doesn't contains any house style issues (in my house style rules) but there are fifteen negative words.

Graded – This shows you words from Easy, Mild, Moderate and Difficult. We use this classification of words in our readability formula to give an accurate assessment for reading difficulty for the whole document.

The Editor's Lists is one feature to review a document before editing with StyleWriter. The other two reviews are the writing statistics and the style and usage issues.

Other Review Tools – Statistical Summary

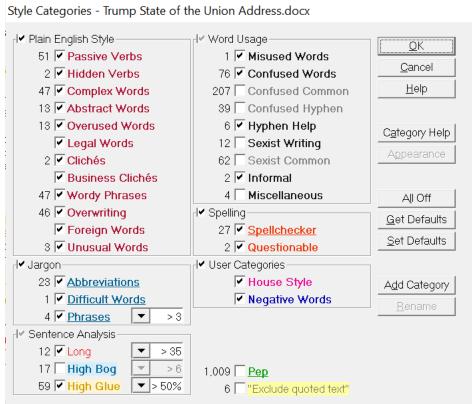

StyleWriter analyzes the 6,200-word State of Union address in about 10 seconds. You then have your statistics available.

Each statistic has a score and rating, compared to the target set for a speech written for the public. When you edit the text with StyleWriter, you'll get your redraft statistics and ratings to measure how much your editing has improved the document. You can save your original and redraft statistics and ratings to audit all documents checked with the program.

Other Review Tools – Category Summary

Finally, you can review the categories of problems found by StyleWriter.

The left-hand side shows style and editing issues, the right-hand side proofreading issues. The State of the Union address has over 200 style issues to review. It shows even professional speechwriters can benefit from StyleWriter's editing analysis and advice.

The three features of the Editor's List, StyleWriter's Statistics and its Category Summary give you an insight into the style of the document before you start editing from StyleWriter's main screen.

If you have any comments or suggestions on these features, send me an email.
